As someone who has put in about 2-3 hours into the game and 50+ hours into the legendry Tales of Vesperia, I found myself drawn into the same fantasy/action genre long ago before I realized it was Tales. HOWEVER, the one thing I noticed that I was not expecting was the tonal shift from known familiar locations of 60-70% of the game to unknown exploration where the odds of survival are way, WAY high, yet it is still familiar. After you complete the prologue and get to the story mode it is a much nicer shift where the stories become more coherent. I have never played a Tales of game outside of the US ones so I have no idea what they can get away with (characters directly addressing each other like in Tales) so I was pleasantly surprised. I never say you should even try this genre so I can't comment on whether you should since I'm not familiar with it, but that was my initial reaction. But I had to try it as I've heard it was good and if it is the same genre as Vesperia I'd be happy to play it. Just don't be surprised if you don't know what the heck you are doing either during single player because there isn't really a tutorial. After setting the difficulty to Hardest (Normal is easy) I started on the story mode with myself, unhardened and fully geared out. I died numerous times and struggled through it. The controls are way better than I expected, however my special attacks didn't feel special and the dodge was frustrating (useless to dodge into attacks). Also, the shield button feels awkward and at times I thought that the attack button would be more useful. After three runs I was finally in a situation to finish the first mission. From that point to the first boss fight I was having troubles but I never gave up. The PS3 version of the game already has some of the features of the 360 so it is already starting to become hard to distinguish between the two versions so I'll say the game is already a lot better than the first official Tales of game (yes, I know there was a PSP one). It's not too bad to handle but when you start playing there are some things that are inefficient and unrealistic and a lot of it is down to your character not making sense. During combat I was constantly trying to dodge and avoid attacks and I was constantly trying to dodge attacks and jump out of it. The bff6bb2d33
